IH Roles in Disaster Planning and Response

Tuesday April 21, 2009

University of Wisconsin - Whitewater

Floods, fires, explosions and other natural or man made disasters often stress a community's ability to protect the welfare of its members and responders. Often these events require the practice of industrial hygiene in one form or another. Please join us for a discussion of case studies and available resources to aid in the planning and execution of safe and effective disaster response. This session should be of interest to environmental and occupational health and safety professionals, public health agencies and emergency management officials.
